The other night in Chicago, a committee of strangers called to escort Mr. Bryan to a public banquet. Mr. Bryan went on shaving himself before a mirror, while he talked to the committee and presently the visitors were busy putting the stude in his shirt bosom An hour or so later he soured out o himself in a reasty great oration, lifting his hearers to the supreme height of patriotic thought-an appeal for a republic so just in all its ways, so mujestic in its virtue, that all the nations of the world would turn to it as the arbitrator of their differences. Mr. Bryan is temperance incarnate. He loves literature rather than art; the trout stream rather than the theater; the farm rather than the city; the small church rather than the cathedrai. He loves men more than books and more than money. There was a time when Mr. Brysn thought that some day the crimes of lawiess wealth and rapacionscorporate power against the toners of the country would bring on a physical struggle and in those days Mr. Bryan was a gladiator, with the fierce enforgiving spirit of the gladiator. But a new tenderness of spirit has come over his life. He is decent and tolerant in his about how the day originated;
